Christine works as an Administrator for a national fast-food company and Monday has started badly for her in the office. Her colleague, Marc, is absent and Christine's line manager has asked her to take on Marc's duties. Christine accesses Marc's e-diary and looks at his to-do list for the coming week and sees that the monthly Area Manager's meeting is due to be held on Friday morning. As none of the tasks have been ticked off, Christine texts Marc to see what still has to be done. The answer is . . . everything.

Christine has not arranged an Area Manager's meeting before and so has no idea what is required.

Christine looks on the intranet for Marc's files from previous meetings to see how these were arranged, but cannot find anything. In his desk drawer she does find a file containing 6 documents to be circulated for the meeting including a draft agenda.

Christine telephones her line manager to ask for some guidance and is given a long list of tasks all with detailed instructions. Christine tries her best but cannot take down enough notes to get all of the details of what must be done. She is more confused than ever.

The monthly meeting is always held in the boardroom of the Edinburgh Head Office and Area Managers are responsible for arranging their own travel and accommodation. They are based all over the UK and most are likely to attend the meeting in person, but all are expected to participate.

How can she make sure this meeting goes ahead as planned?
